E-MAIL: TO SEND OR NOT TO SEND

When parents communicate by e-mail with teachers remember the following:

- ❖ Don't assume that the recipient checks e-mail as regularly as you do; likewise, do not expect an immediate response. Questions about tomorrow's field trip, for example, are best handled over the phone.
- ❖ If your e-mail communication requires more than one reply, then you are involved in a discussion. Discussions of issues or problems should be handled face-to-face or on the phone. This allows for better communication and easier clarification.
- ❖ Do not make a practice of forwarding personal e-mails. Remember, when you e-mail school personnel, accidental forwarding can happen. Do not type anything you would not be willing to say in public.
- ❖ Recognize that if you send an e-mail that contains a complaint, it is in your best interest for the teacher to set up an appointment to meet with you personally. You are welcome to request that the principal be present.
- ❖ Be very careful about your wording as you are not conveying emotion but your reader may infer it. Smiley face emoticons do not communicate accurately. It is a good idea to read your e-mail, aloud, before sending it, to be assured that your words and structure are clear.
- ❖ Be aware that good teachers cannot discuss other staff members, other parents, or children other than your own. This is gossip. Please do not include questions or information about others in your communication. These kinds of concerns should be brought to the attention of the principal or the pastor and should be handled in person.
- ❖ When writing your e-mail, be sure to be clear about your goal, be specific about what you want done and show respect. If it is a word or an attitude that you wouldn't use in public, don't type it into your computer.

Not all e-mails deal with conflict but sometimes they can create it. If you are e-mailing because you are not feeling comfortable enough with face-to-face talk, that alone is enough reason to avoid electronic communication. E-mail is best left for issues that can be resolved with factual information. Other issues that involve conflict or might inspire conflict should be handled in person.
